

NOT AN XS?

Looks That Work on Camera

Natalia Moskalova

Hi, I'm Natalia.

If you've ever thought, "I'm just not the right size for beautiful photos" — you're not alone.

I photograph women of different shapes and ages, and I can honestly say: your size has never stopped anyone from looking amazing on camera.

What can get in the way is wearing something that simply doesn't work for you.

Style and fashion have been a long-time passion of mine — not just a work tool.

So this guide isn't theory from the internet. It's what I've tested myself: what actually works on camera, and what is simply a trend on the street.

One thing is important right away: this guide isn't about "hiding."

When clothes fit well, you don't think about them at all. And that's the best thing that can happen during a photoshoot.

A loose, well-designed cut gives your body room to move. And this is exactly where those shots appear that you want to show off, not hide away in an archive.

That's what I mean when I say — forget about 'problem areas.'

The question is simple: does this outfit help you move in front of the camera — or get in the way? And one more thing, even more important than size: does your look feel modern and stylish — or simply "acceptable"?

Because that's not what this guide is about — just taking a nice photo, but about you looking and feeling like yourself.

The good news: what works well on camera today also looks modern in everyday life.

Wide-leg, oversized trousers, relaxed shirts, trench coats — these don't distort your figure. They're part of a modern wardrobe that works beautifully on different body shapes.

And there's one rule worth remembering: if the top is loose, the bottom or waist should create a line. Loose everywhere at once — and hello, a sack instead of a silhouette.

Vertical lines are your best friend. A long sleeve, a straight-cut shirt, an unbuttoned jacket or trench coat — all of these elongate the silhouette and work beautifully on camera.

And one more thing: layering.

A shirt under a sweater, a vest over a T-shirt, an open trench over a dress. Scarves add movement and give you more options during the shoot.

There are also fabrics that work for you — and those that can ruin even a good look.

Choose: linen, medium-weight knitwear, wool and satin in a relaxed cut, natural colors and a soft sheen. They hold their shape, move beautifully and look great on camera.

Be careful with: thin stretch fabric in tight-fitting clothes — it emphasizes every fold and tension in the fabric; very stiff fabrics that stand away from the body — they add unnecessary volume to the silhouette; and shiny synthetic fabric — light often creates unwanted highlights on it.

And one more thing: texture is almost always more interesting than decoration.

Linen, wool, denim, good knitwear can make an outfit feel richer even when the whole look is monochrome.

Forget the myth that “some colors are slimming.”

For a photoshoot, what matters isn't which color is “slimming,” but how that color works with the look.

Total look is one of the easiest ways to visually lengthen the silhouette. When the top and bottom are close in color, the look doesn't break into separate horizontal sections, and the figure appears visually taller.

That doesn't mean you have to dress head to toe in one color. You can combine close shades — ivory and beige, grey and charcoal, blue and navy. And one accent detail — a scarf, shoes or jewelry — adds character to the look.

And one more thing: solid colors work best for photoshoots. Small prints can look busy, while large lettering, high-contrast patterns or horizontal lines across the chest can draw attention away from the face.

If you're unsure — choose a solid color. It looks calmer, more polished and keeps the focus on you. Fewer colors, fewer distractions, more cohesion.

TOTAL LOOK

WRAP DRESS

A wrap dress is one of the simplest formulas for a photoshoot.

The V-neckline opens up the neck, the wrap creates a soft vertical line, while the waist stays defined without feeling restrictive.

Choose a style that moves with you rather than fighting your body.

A midi or slightly below-the-knee length also works beautifully on camera — especially in motion.

SHIRT + WIDE-LEG TROUSERS

LAYERING

CASUAL SUIT

DETAILS MATTER

DETAILS MATTER

NOT JUST FOR PHOTOSHOOTS

These formulas work far beyond a photoshoot.

Total look — for coffee.

Layering — for a walk.

A wrap dress — for dinner.

These aren't "photoshoot looks" you'll wear once and forget. They're practical formulas for your everyday wardrobe.

So next time you open your wardrobe and don't know what to wear, remember: one of these formulas is already waiting for you.

READY TO SEE YOURSELF DIFFERENTLY?

I help you prepare your looks,
choose a location and create a photoshoot where you'll look like the best version of yourself.

Vienna – Europe

DM me to discuss your photoshoot:
@natali.moskalova

Natalia Moskalova